[From the New York Tribune.] MABEL.

BY W. D. O'CONNER. The shining sickles the respect wield Are bright to the sunlit morn-

They go to the opelent harvert-held To reap its wealth of corn. The choral winds of morning chunt

A harvest song of praise, And the mellow sunlight shines aslant

Through the Autumn's golden baze. No more to bind the amber sheaves With resper bands I go: I stand where the rays in the gilded caves From the Orient softly flow. The days of my life are old and sere,

But my heart is glad and young, For the song of the singing birds I hear Are the meludies once they sung. I am old, but hope can never decay, And why should my spirit care-The sun sheds blessings on locks of gray,

And hallows an old man's hair. My promier and passional days are flown, But the light in the valley shiper— And from the olorous woodlands still is blown The balm of the balsam pince;

My hopes are plumed with, the wings of doves And away from earthly things, Let the amaranth visions of early loves Find rest for their weary wings. O, Phonals hopes! such rest ye found When ye rose from a heart of flame To a heaven of love, to gather round

Mabul-dream of the years that fell-That fell by the reaper, Time; It was here in the affinent harvest dell. When my youth was in its prime, It was down in the harvest pride, unshorn, We stood with the resper bands, And love to our hearts was thrillingly borne,

In the tremulous clasp of hands.

Twin stars in the mellow morn-

One simple, sylvan name.

The golden radiance lent your face The hyacinth bue of the grafts, And flushing your check with a maidenly grace. And bloom-roses there were lain; And love saw mymeries to your eyes-

And dreamed in your red lips' parted dyes. Of pearls amid the own. So the sweet visions of gentle Ruth Is annaled in Orient lore, When the Syrian nobleman gave his youth To her beauty forevermore.

And it was love of the lands from when

In the Autumo's amber pride,

Your beauty and virginal innocence Was borne a wedded bride. That night there was joy in the gabled manes When home were the harvest swains. The young and the beautiful met in the dance To the bounding music's strains;

And the trusting love in Mabel's eyes, In their clear and holy shine, Was the love-O, spirit in Paradise! When they last looked in mine.

The sheaves of mygolifen years-But Thou leavest hope in the sepui And emiles in a world of tears; The pines are green Immortalities When the Eden blossoms die, And the passion that staks with the space:

Sweet pence in the star-sown sky. Softly the wings of Autumn sing Their choral song of pruise, And a prophecy thus to my soul they bring Of its slowly parting days-Of the sleep that shall fondly and gently glide

On my eyes from a chilly hand-Of the dawn, with Mahel by my side In the calm of another land,
